FELLOW INVESTIGATORS

ANTIQUES DEALER

A month or so ago, an old partner in crime, smuggler George Cassidy, sent you a strange letter asking if you were still in the business of selling strange and exotic goods.

After nearly being busted several years ago, you both vowed to cease your life of crime and obtain respectable occupations. You decided to exploit your knowledge of antiques and fancy goods and went legit as an antiques dealer. Cassidy, always fond of the sea, decided to become a lighthouse keeper up on Beacon Island, of all things!

Now, while Cassidy's letter states the matter is far from illegal, you know him better than anyone else and strongly suspect he wasn't being honest with you. You were both saddened and annoyed that he would attempt to pull you back into that world again. You didn't reply to his letter, but it's been preying on your mind, especially as you've been hearing rumors of someone asking lots of questions about antique coins. Coming so soon after your letter from Cassidy, you're sure the two are connected.

You're currently journeying to Rockport so you can pay Cassidy a surprise visit on his little island "retreat" and see just what the fool's got himself mixed up in this time. You never know, maybe you'll be able to slap some sense into the reckless old smuggler.

Even if he won't tell you what he's up to, he always leaves a pretty solid paper trail (one of the reasons you nearly got caught last time), so perhaps you can rummage through his things to find out why he's (probably) lying to you. He won't be happy about it, but tough - someone's got to save him from himself.

Roleplaying hooks:

- To find out what sort of trouble Cassidy's gotten himself into this time and see if you can't straighten him out. Again.
