Individual Company Culture - EMBA 60

The Company culture at The Boeing Company is not entirely dissimilar in some ways to the way the Netflix team describes their culture. We utilize fairly low context communications, we evaluate one another very directly, we make decisions as teams, build trust through tasks, disagree with reasonable confrontation, and handle our schedule very linearly. Within our group, I think our communication style is fairly effective. I would sum up the culture as direct, hard working, and driven but friendly too. Our company culture does however lead to some challenges. One of the big challenges we face is in our decision making style. We require subject matter expert reviews, utilize long checklists, and hold formal reviews. In doing this we work very collaboratively and make decisions carefully. We also make them slowly and at high cost of engineering hours. In my group, AvionX, we directly compete with other electronics companies to provide avionics solutions to Boeing. Our slow pricey decision making can drive us to lose contracts vs leaner competition who empower decision makers at a lower level.

A second challenge we face is in our styles of direct evaluation and conflict driven disagreement. Our team members take their roles very seriously and we expect a lot from one another. I think typically, direct evaluation and health conflict does drive better outcomes but in times of high stress these tendencies can increase stress on individuals and lead to poor decision making or strained relationships. In both cases the reasoning for our culture is clear but our team could improve its outcomes by improving its cultural flexibility.
